Continuation of 11. does NOT place the application in condition for allowance because: The applicants argue that Minami fails to teach sending outgoing data packets to different processors in alternating order. However, Minimai does tech this, as seen in paragraphs 1745 and 1746. In paragraph 1745, it teaches that when processing is done, it signals to a module that a comopleted packet is ready to transmit. In paragraph 1746, this paragraph then teaches that the processors are servied in alternating order. Further, in paragraph 1746, it teaches the processing of a single data packet as well. Read in context of the invention, Minami teaches sending an outgoing data packet to a first processor and an outgoin gdata packet to a second processor in alternating order. The applicants also argue that Minami does not teach pipeliens for ESP encryption. However, Minami thorougly teaches this throughout the reference. As seen in the Microsoft Dictioanry Fifth Edition, pipelining is described as follows: "2. In parallel processing, a method in which instructions are passed from one processing unit to another, as on an assembly line, and each unit is specialized for performing a particular type of operation." Minami teaches parallel processing throughout the reference, such as in pragraph 16. Further, Minami's parallel processing is evident in paragraphs 1746, as it teaches two parallel processors in which instructions are passed from one to another in alternating order.
